STARVING ON THE VOLGA

The New York Times

The famine in Russia is spreading to many cities and districts. The government is taking measures to alleviate the situation, but the situation remains critical. The Times reports on the severity of the famine and the efforts being made to provide relief.

The Times notes that the famine is affecting not only rural areas but also cities, with many people in desperate need of food. The government has declared a state of emergency and is coordinating efforts with local authorities.

The situation is particularly dire in the Volga region, where the Times describes the conditions as "starving on the Volga." The region is known for its rich agricultural lands, but this year's harvest has been severely affected by drought and disease.

The Times reports that the famine has led to widespread suffering, with many people resorting to desperate measures to obtain food. The government is working to distribute food supplies, but the situation remains critical.

The Times urges the international community to take action to alleviate the famine in Russia, calling on governments and organizations to provide additional aid and support to those in need.